James Streeling is murdered in an apparent carjacking. Early the next morning, the carjacker is also murdered. The police manage to kill one of the carjacker's killers and are busy tracking down the second killer, but as far as the carjacking is concerned, the police are ready to close the case. But James Streeling's daughter, Debbie, and a friend don't think this is a simple carjacking and decide to dig a little deeper. The daughter hires a couple of private detective agencies from a couple of different cities and things start popping up that don't add up. The stuff Debbie is finding points to a murder-for-hire operation against her father that didn't go quite as expected but the evidence isn't strong enough for the police. After a few months, someone grows tired of waiting on the police to reopen the Streeling murder and starts killing those who appear to be responsible with a pistol-style crossbow.
