The Global Environmental Crisis: A global perspective for a sustainable future and a non-exclusive proposal to the European Union Giovanni Rantucci

The social, political and economic transition from 3.8 billion people in 1970 to 7 billion in 2011 and most probably 8 in 2025, represents a new phase in human history. Great changes are expected to occur in the next two decades and radical decisions are to be taken accordingly: humanity is currently confronted with huge environmental impacts, the further deterioration of climate and the decline of biodiversity. To these phenomena, which have already occurred in the past, are now associated risks such as the decreasing hospitability of the biosphere, the on going financial and economic global crisis, the growing divide between rich and poor and the fact that future generations are being deprived of non renewable resources we are depleting at unprecedented speed. Either we react to the decline of the environment and society through scientific progress, an efficient democracy and the initiation of a sustainable development process, or we will all be involved in local and regional conflicts and affected by widespread global instability. The book "The Global Environmental Crisis", A global perspective for a sustainable future and a non-exclusive proposal to the European Union (2012), illustrates the climate change triggered by human activities and a society not ready yet for a well-timed transition. The Author's proposal is based on a long-term Sustainable Development Process (SPD) coordinated by the United Nations, and a short term Reference Transition Model (RTM) that big Nations, and the European Union first, should carry on for a way out of the current emergency. Around twenty copies of the book "The Global Environmental Crisis" have been donated to the European Union Authorities and some Member Countries, and to the Secretary General of the United Nations in the hope that action is taken before it is too late, before climate change starts driving the game.
